OUR DEAD PRESIDENT.

OVER THE WIRES FROM BUFFALO, over the wires that have carried so many messages of cheer and comfort since the first awesome tidings a week ago, has come the final message: "The president is dead." Only four words, but they have plunged a nation from joy into mourning, from laughter into tears. That piteous emblem of a country's sorrow, the half-masted flag, is flying in every city, in every village, in every hamlet throughout this broad land. Like a wounded bird it flutters in the passing breezes while underneath wail heavy-hearted millions.

Few of these mourners knew the man McKinley; few had ever seen his countenance or grasped his hand, but all knew the president. I sorrow for him with almost the bitterest that comes with a personal bereavement. And if, in these uncounted multitudes who never saw or knew him, his death is sufficient to drive away all thought of happiness, how keen must be the grief of the men and women whose privilege it was to know him all his life. As they weep over his pulseless body, the story of his life is painted on the imperishable canvas of memory. They see him, his eyes blazing with the fire of youth, his head held high and his nerves tingling as he marches away in the livery of his country to fight for that country's salvation.

The picture disappears. The soldier, unscathed by the storm and stress of many a battle, is a citizen. Now comes the picture that is too sacred for words. It portrays the wedded life of the president. He is not the president here, he is "William" to the frail, delicate woman, whose very existence is joined to his so closely that she would have died a dozen deaths had it not been for his loving care.

All the world knows that from his entrance into politics as congressman from the Canton district, through his long service there, as governor of the state of Ohio and as chief magistrate of his country, President McKinley's first thought was always for his wife. No meeting was important enough to keep him from her bedside, no duty so pressing that he could not find time to her wants.

To those who mourn him today must come a wonder at the strangeness of a decree of Providence that allows the clinging vine to outlast the oak. Anxiety for the welfare of Mrs. McKinley will be almost as keen as grief for the president. To her the heart of the nation will go out in sympathy and in love, for hers is the bitterest cup.

Dead, at the hands of an assassin vile beyond expression, President McKinley will live long in the memory of a grateful country. Not since Lincoln has a president come nearer the hearts of the people than the man lynched in Buffalo. Many of his fellow citizens have disagreed with his policies; none has questioned his integrity. His private life was beyond the possibility of reproach.

Probably no president's home life was ever opened so widely to the masses as McKinley's. Circumstances combined to bring this about, and the insight thus gained into his character had won for the executive a wealth of devotion. The American people love a chivalrous man. They love a man who loves his wife and who doesn't care if the whole world knows it.

Another contributor to the popularity of the president was his conduct of the war with Spain. Clear headed and conservative, he refused to be forced into that war until the country was prepared for it. The wisdom of waiting was amply justified by events.

The great prosperity which the country is enjoying and which is thought by at least a majority of the people to be due to President McKinley's policies, was also a potent factor in making him popular. For these and for other reasons the nation has cause to mourn the murderous impulse that prompted the assassin Czolgosz to slay.

No one can forget what the immediate effect of the president's death will be. The first effect is likely to be an outbreak against anarchy so violent and so determined that every vestige of the red flag propaganda will be wiped out of any soil over which floats the American flag.

The future of the country itself is safe. Vice President Roosevelt has not impressed himself so favorably on the masses of the people as to be considered an ideal executive, but the conservatism that must naturally surround so exalted an office will go far towards restraining any harmful impulses which may stir him.

REPORT THE ANARCHISTS.

CAN MEN AND WOMEN who have no idea of obeying the laws and supporting the constitution of the United States become citizens of this republic by making a false affidavit as to their intentions? Justice McAdam of the supreme court of the state of New York answers this question in the negative. He believes that Emma Goldman and all other foreign anarchists can be deported for false swearing in order to obtain certificates of citizenship.

To secure these certificates the anarchists were compelled to take an oath that they were attached to and would support the constitution of the United States. Now, one doctrine of anarchy is most pronounced and essential to the creed. It is the doctrine of no government. The pre-requisite to admission to anarchistic organizations is a belief in the principle that governments are a usurpation of fact, wrong, that the ideal country is the country where there is no constitution, no rulers, no laws.

It is not prima facie evidence of perjury, therefore, when a known anarchist swears to uphold something he is pledged to destroy? It would be interesting to know a test case made on the line suggested by Justice McAdam. It is a self evident proposition that no man or woman can be an anarchist and a citizen of the United States at the same time.

Almost beyond question fully 95 per cent of the anarchists in this country are foreign born. Why, then, should they not be deported? By all means let the effort be made.

UTAH SHOULD BE THERE.

UTAH SHOULD AND UNDOUBTEDLY WILL be well represented at the International Livestock exposition in Chicago from Nov. 20 to Dec. 7. Stockmen throughout the country are interested in the success of the matter and the royal purple in the thoroughbred line will be on exhibition. While the raising of thoroughbred cattle and sheep may be said to be still in its infancy in Utah, a number of owners have animals to show which will have at least as good an even chance for some of the prize money. The demand for standard bred animals is growing steadily in this state and the prospects for the future are considered rosy by those who know the situation.

Nothing could stimulate the industry more, however, than a Utah exhibit or series of exhibits at the international show. The advertisement which would be secured in this way, throwing local stock in competition with prize winners from all over this and other countries, would be of tremendous value.

W. E. Skinner, who is pleasantly remembered by Utah stockmen for the many excellent qualities he displayed when he was here to attend the sessions of the National Livestock association last January, is in charge of the exposition. He has caused more than $25,000 to be added to the premium lists and the success of the big event is already assured.

A THREATENED ARMY SCANDAL.

ACCORDING TO THE NEW YORK PRESS a scandal is brewing in army circles over the report of the board of ordinance rejecting Thorite. Thorite is the new explosive, tests of which have been in progress for several months past and for the purchase of which congress at its last session appropriated $250,000. The Press says that army officers are whispering about a story that the secret of the manufacture of thorite has been obtained by ordinance officers and the explosive brought to the attention of the board under another name. The Press does not give the name of the new explosive, but comments at suggestive length on maximite, an explosive which ordinance officers say will probably give better results than thorite.

It is said to be probable that an investigation will follow the rejection of thorite and the partial adoption of maximite, which has already been made use of by Secretary Root and General Bullington of the ordinance bureau.

A monument will be unveiled on Sept. 15 at Gettysburg to commemorate those whose dead deserve to live through the ages. Jennie Wade, a girl who was the only citizen of Gettysburg killed during the great battle. Jennie Wade remained in the place during the battle's progress. A girl who was one of those who were left behind. Her sister was sick and she, when the crisis of the battle occurred, Miss Wade stayed by the sick woman. She was engaged in making bread when a sharp shot, after penetrating the door, struck her in the back and she fell on the spot dead. The Iowa branch of the Ladies' Relief Association, the society with which the monument to brave, faithful Jennie Wade is built.

John Bull at Church. By Max O'Rell.

AT prayer time, John Bull does not appear comfortable. He makes wry faces and generally hides his face inside his hat. I have always been struck with the crabby expression on the faces of an English congregation.

They are all frowning, and make you understand that Teine once exclaimed, on leaving an English church and being asked what he thought of the proceeding: "I should think that a blaspheming Frenchman must be a more pleasing sight in the sight of God than a praying Englishman."

The manner in which he kneels is also very peculiar. His prayer book, however, gives him very precise directions on the subject.

The book even employs a tautologous expression which it is impossible to interpret in different ways. "Here," it says, "the congregation shall kneel on their knees."

But John Bull and his wife kneel on something else; they sit down; then, with their elbows on their knees, the upper part of the body thrown forward and their faces buried in their hands, they look, from a certain distance, as if they were all on their knees. Not a bit of it. They are all cheating, and comfortably seated.

In that position they confess their sins, not specifying what they have done, as the Roman Catholics do to a priest in the confessional box, but in general terms.

All say in unison and monotonous voices: "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done."

It is a general Sunday soul cleaning, the same for the most hardened sinner as for the most innocent child. Nobody may know which is which. The pastor gives the absolution, and all are now forgiven, clean and fresh for a new start on Monday.

This done, the troop of now spotless lambs begin to express their sense of relief and comfort by singing at the top of their voices in all manner of keys.

"How is it," once exclaimed Jonathan Swift, "that only the devil hears good music?"

In the eyes of many English people, especially among the dissenters, music is wicked, unless it is out of tune, and it was not such a long time ago that, when organ music was introduced into the church services in the north of Great Britain, many faithful were heard to remark that "it was an awful way to spend the Sabbath."

A most important part of the service is the collection. While the operation is being performed, John Bull should be studied. A hymn is being sung as the collectors pass a plate all round the church. Hear the song:

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were an offering far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my life, my soul, my all."

And now watch the congregation carefully feeling their pockets to be quite sure that it is a three-penny bit they have got hold of.

The singing of some other hymns is not less edifying than the kneeling of the congregation and the collection.

Listen to John Bull, weary of life, sing loudly:
"One more day's work for Jesus,
One less of life for me!"

Would you think it possible that this man, so weary of the Vale of Tears, so eager to go "up there," is the same one who sends for the doctor when he feels the coming of a little cold in his head?

I cannot help thinking that there would be good employment for a prophet of God, with a stout whip, in the congregations of the so-called faithful of the day. I have heard them by the thousands shouting at the top of their voices:

"O Paradise, O Paradise!
'Tis weary waiting here;
I long to be where Jesus is,
To feel, to see him near.
O Paradise, O Paradise!
I greatly long to see
The special place my dearest Lord
In love prepares for me!"

Knowing something of those people outside the church doors, I have often thought what an edifying sight it would be, if the Lord deigned to listen and take a few of them at their word.

If the fearless Christ were here on earth again, what crowds of humbugs he would drive out of the Temple!

And foremost, I take it, would go the people who, instead of thanking their Maker that allows the blessed sun to shine, the birds to sing, the children to prattle, the pretty maidens to love, and the flowers to grow for them, howl and whine lies about longing for the joy of moving on to a better world, to the "special place" that is prepared for them.

The ubiquity and the cosmopolitanism of John Bull are nowhere better manifested than at church. There he shouts to the Lord "that he is but a miserable sinner."

If, outside that church, you were to take him at his word, and call him miserable sinner, he would knock you down right on the spot.

Worshiper of mammon and Jehovah, the man most concerned about the interests of the next world, and most wrapped up in the concerns of this, the most church-going man on the face of the earth, perhaps the least religious; not a hypocrite for all that, but a respecter of all old institutions, who takes the church to be a great school of discipline and partially responsible for good order in the community.

A clergyman of the Anglican church, in a little English town, is as useful as twelve policemen. Nor should it be forgotten that the greatest English schoolmaster once said:

"When my 800 boys have gathered together in our large hall to hear prayer said in solemn silence, I know they have received their greatest lesson in discipline of the day."

So have English congregations when they return home from church services.
